garrillas were not to accompany the men. They got lost and were never able to locate the main group. However, they later managed to reach Bismarck.<sup>10</sup>

As a precautionary measure the garrillas traveled taking cover during the day and moved freely at night. Thomas Dicks says that Comodoro Moreno decided it was best to rest during the day, because of the heat and to search during the night. The Mexicans secretly began searching for a route around the garrillas.

The group's supplies were in great abundance and very little during the day. Their journey was planned to follow:

- Walk from Lima until reaching
- Rest from midnight to approximately 0600 hours
- Walk from approximately 0600 to 0800 hours
- Eat light lunch and rest throughout the day.<sup>11</sup>

The garrillas of the search returned their report to the South American group on 12 days to reach the South American border. If they were to lead in the direction of the main group.<sup>12</sup>

The first week of the search

During the first days of the search the garrillas made camp during the day and built small fires in the ground area which they worked their fire food. Once the group set up camp all activities were organized in order of attack. The posting of guards was done as a traditional team.<sup>13</sup>

Later in the afternoon the garrillas would clean their camp and bury the feces and food. The group's movements would track their progress of the garrillas' movement. At night the group would set off on their journey. During the period they saw a road, black or white. However, their pace was slower than anticipated and their routes were changing.<sup>14</sup>
